HOW FESTIVALS CAPTURED SUMMER

When 34-year-old Somerset farmer Michael Eavis started the first Glastonbury Festival in 1970 - with free milk for every festival-goer – he didn't really know what he had started.

Glastonbury was not the first or biggest rock festival in Britain's fields. But it was the event that kickstarted the UK's love affair with outdoor music events.

From metal fans to clubbing mums, from loud students to fans of alternative culture, there seems to be something for everyone.

Glastonbury 'catalyst'

Glastonbury had a reputation for poor security - which allowed thousands of festival-goers to see the event for free by jumping the fence - until there was a one-year break in 2001.

Then the organisers got that super-fence in 2002, which means if you buy a ticket now for Glastonbury that's the only way you can get in. You can't just waltz in like people could in the past.

24-hour sell-out

By 2003 festivals had become very popular. Sir Richard Branson's Virgin brand had started the V festival in 1996. It was so successful that some years later a similar one was organised in Reading and also in Leeds.

"We put our tickets on sale at 2004 prices just after last year's event, and we sold a third of them immediately," says organiser Geoff Ellis. "Then in February we put the rest of the tickets on sale, and were the first UK festival to sell out four days later," he says.

"Maybe some years ago dance culture was bigger, but now people seem to have gone back to guitar music and rock music," he adds.

Festival 'holiday'

The need for festivals comes as people's lifestyles change, he believes.

"When I started going to festivals in the early 1970s, the idea that someone as old as 22 or 23 would go to a festival was strange. People that age were preparing to get married and buy a house.

"A festival has become almost like a holiday. Instead of going away to Spain for two weeks, people are taking some of their holiday and taking five days off for Glastonbury or Reading."

Task B

You are a regular reader of a problem page on the Internet. Recently you have found the following letter:

I am a 17-year-old boy living with my mother and two sisters. My elder sister and my mother are working and my younger sister is still at school. I can see how difficult it is for my mother and sister to keep me and my younger sister comfortable and I want to help as much as I can although they say they don't want me to. Can you suggest any ways which you or any of your friends know about by which I can earn some money?

Raoul
